On one of the Windows 2003 Enterprise Server systems, when the application is installed, if one changes the DNS settings to point at the appropriate root DNS servers, the client SMS gateway starts to respond. The response it produces is "The system cannot communicate with the SMS-SMS Gateway Service on Windows Server 2003" and then the windows system logs the details of the request/respond. In the event of this happening, we have to revert the DNS setting back to the root DNS servers, which in turn kills the SMS Gateway functionality. Because of this, we can't test the product in a domain environment - only on the client machines because changing DNS settings on the server systems is a tedious procedure. The SMS Gateway software runs on the Windows Server 2003 Enterprise Server systems but is installed on the client systems. We have looked into the possibility of modifying the registry, but because we can't test this in a domain environment, we are not sure of what would actually work. Any suggestions to try? A: I figured out the solution to this question: You have to do the following steps: Stop the SMS Gateway software on the client machines Start the SMS Gateway software At this stage, once it had completed it's initialization it would allow one to configure the SMS gateway on a client system NOTE: The f678ea9f9e
